In 1887 John A. Mitchell, the original editor of Life magazine, raised $800 to send 266 New York City children to the newly organized Life Fresh Air Farm in Branchville, Connecticut. Throughout our evolution from Life's Fresh Air Farm, to Life's Camps, to current day Trail Blazers, we continue to be guided by the same vision and mission: to help young people grow within by going outside. We create and provide programs and opportunities to develop critical life skills through outdoor experiences and outdoor programs, accessible to all, that equip and empower youth to lead productive lives.

Each of our programs addresses an essential need for every-day New York families: our exciting summer overnight and day camp adventures bring summer camp within reach for everyone, ensuring that all young people have safe and exhilarating opportunities to grow during the summer months; our affordable after school programs bring much needed play to the school environment, helping young people develop essential social emotional skills through play, collaboration and daily science experiments. Our programs are designed to instill the values of caring, cooperating, sharing and settling differences peacefully; the proper use of nature and its resources; the benefits of simple, self-sufficient lifestyles – along with a sense of worth; the joy of effort; and the knowledge that all individuals are empowered to make life good for themselves and those around them.
